Women's Studies

an interdisciplinary concentration

Programme

The Women's Studies Programme at Loyola Campus consists of an interdisciplinary concentration which provides a programme of courses on the status and problems of women in society. The courses examine the role of women in the context of Western history, art, literature, society and the family. The courses will be valuable to those who will work in public agencies, family services, educational institutions or any organization concerned with women, families and communities. The concentration provides valuable background for jobs in personnel work, social work, counselling, law, teaching (at any level), medicine, mass media and any occupation related to family concerns.

Upon completion of the requirements for this concentration, students will be given an entry of "Interdisciplinary Concentration in Women's Studies" on their transcripts.

Admission

This concentration offers a special emphasis on Women's Studies to be taken in addition to a departmental major or honours programme. It is not necessary that the department in which the student is enrolled be an active participant in this programme. The intention of the programme is to offer a concentration in Women's Studies to a student in any academic field.
